Since the Renaissance, many attempts have been made to develop ideal cities in which there would live perfect and sustainable communities. The new cities were planned in rational and geometric styles, trying to reflect the new habits and evolution of societies with the aim of improving the living conditions of its inhabitants. However, due to their complexity, the vast majority of them failed to transpose the theoretical idealizations of a utopian urbanism.

The Arches bar stool is a redesign of the original dining chair. Suggesting the complexity of utopian cities, organized by the principles of symmetry and ideal forms, the profile shows details that seem to be drawn from large architectural structures. The raised backrest stands out from the remaining set that only crosses in a single point, whereas a folded brass bar arises as a support element that prevents the contact of the arches with the floor.
